Authoritarian Parent

Authoritarian parenting style can be very rigid and strict. Most often everything is decided by the father or by the mother in a single parent home. Parents who use this style have a strict set of rules and expectations; if rules are not followed it ends up with punishment.

Authoritative Parent

The authoritative style consists of following the same rules as the authoritarian parents. With having strict rules and expectations however, there is more open communication with parents and children in the authoritative style.

They listen more to the child and how they are. When children have problems with rules and they are broken these parents tend to be more receptive.

Permissive Parent

Permissive parenting is often the style parents try to stay away from. There is not much structure here for children, and parents often do not set rules or have guidelines for the child. They do not have many expectations for the children; they avoid conflict and are more nurturing to the child. They are more lenient when it comes to misbehavior and often do not punish the children for wrongdoing.

Uninvolved Parent

Uninvolved parenting style is exactly how uninvolved is defined, parents are often absent emotionally and sometimes even physically. They have no expectations of the child and regularly do not have communication or a nurturing feature to them. They provide everything the child needs for survival with little to no engagement

Parents help map out the flight plan!

A photograph of a smiling family of three—a mother, a father, and a young child—sitting together on a light-colored couch. The mother is on the left, wearing a blue cardigan over a white top. The father is on the right, wearing a white button-down shirt over a grey t-shirt. The child is in the center, wearing a green cardigan. They are all smiling warmly at the camera. The background is a bright, out-of-focus indoor setting.
